

Index to the silent service method thread - the first 100 pages

Notes on the index

As a new reader of the thread I started at the beginning and worked my way through page by page. Obviously this took days and a lot of stuff wasn't relevant or worthwhile reading. To help new readers of the thread I've so far gone through the first 100 pages of the thread and written down the posts that you really should read. That doesn't mean that there aren't any other posts worth reading but if you only read these you will get the meat and potatoes of the method.

The best posts are ones written by Chris and unsolicited from anyone else, ie they are the posts where Chris has decided a point needs to be made and he has made it. After that are the vast amount of chart examples. Some of these are support/resistance finding charts, some are potential setups and some are actual trades.

I've listed the pages and post numbers in order and also separated the more useful posts into loose categories. As you would expect the method posts are near the start of the thread and after a while it becomes mostly charts. The vast majority of posts are by Chris but where other posters have clear charts or good ideas I have included those too.

There are bound to be some really good posts in the following pages but mostly charts rather than profound posts about the method or anything else but it is surely worth your time reading through. I may, in time, go through the next few hundred pages and pick out the more profound method or psychology type posts for another index but at least this will start you off.

The listings below are in the following order... page number-post number-brief description.
